Boro College Splits Summer Sessions

Brooklyn College will hold a two-part Summer session for the first time in history, it was announced today, with classes conducted at the college and at the New York State Agricultural and Technical Institute, Morrisville, N. Y.

At the latter institution, 200 students will participate in a farm labor program in addition to pursuing their studies. Students may elect nine credits or approximately three subjects.

The farm group will use the facilities of the institute's classrooms as well as the poultry and cattle buildings. The curriculum will be geared to farm life and will include farm biology, rural sociology and geology.

Required subjects will include English composition and English literature, sociology, political science and mathematics for freshmen and sophomores.

The experiment at Morrisville is expected to demonstrate the feasibility of a work-study plan of education in the country.
