THE LESSON

Ronaldo Wilson

. . . I was not born to be forced . . .
—Henry Thoreau

. . . I'm a prisoner with the others . . .
—Tom Sleigh

Does it begin by force? To transcend thatches of skin, one face like another cliniqued and carbuncled

with slacks,

transfix the great heart:

art is equal to blood is equal to the savage that you aren’t.
In the abyss, you sing I am clear. I am all parts of the whole.
I am the whole. Where do you fit?

Do you never want to break out dancing in the middle of a crowded room:
or is the organic you a fine wisp, a god
of good hair, a saint shot out to space?

When the wind pushes against my house
and it feels like it might fall into itself,
I am a cardhouse.

On Real T.V., in a suburb, caught on video white teens sledgehammer
the toilets and tubs of a friend.

In the trail of boric acid I lay out for the roaches, do the vermin know bleach, flour—they are about to be killed?
How do you know by force or equation a chasm, a magnet
a soul
or by what word is beauty—
begin with being a bore
or being bore through in a market,
the surprise, each time, in being called, sir.

Side B: aesthetic theory—Your skin is pink, then opaque, carmelized then burned
if you are one of the drumsticks stuffed in a bowl, as in holocaust.

NYTimes, East Timor. A blown apart leg unskinned, a shoe’s sole ripped back to bone, synonym for torso in a soccer shirt.

This is ours. We are pickled, you and me with this strange leg.

Should I turn the chicken over?

See your life as screenic,
think collage,
ethnograph—He is your brown body.

Buy chanel, egoiste,
a black border. When I turn the page: crack the bone and scrape out the marrow for marinade.

You do not fall from the sky
en route to Paris, but die in the flash flood mud with the others.

Salamanders roil. The silverbacks peep out of their jungle.

Finally, the deserved. Your body laid without a listerined and living mouth.

How to love the wisp of your face, the not watching out
the knowing in being clear
and white:

Not on the margin
nor pushed out
on smack, on safari, I am an ellipsis.

I do not come in peace

for the flesh that stinks
of the heart and bone you’ve devoured.

Transcend: I am a face
ready to cut into you
stalagmites by fist.

Think of razors, think
of obsidian, think

of how and where we begin.
