Freedom of the press in danger on campuses.

Aldemaro Romero Jr.
CUNY Bernard M Baruch College
The paper, which is partly financed by the University of Kentucky, is a well-researched student newspaper, which has won numerous journalism awards. Curiously, the University of Kentucky itself is home to a First Amendment Center.

But, when the paper sought the records about theaccordion, the university refused to release the documents. Then the newspaper followed the procedure under the Kentucky law, and appealed to the state attorney general. The attorney general first ruled that the university should submit the documents to him in private. When that failed, the attorney general called on the university to release the documents to the newspaper with the same standard.

However, the legal dispute was in certain ways disagreeable. Although the records have already been disclosed, the university cannot be compelled to release them. Then the newspaper, following the law, made theOnly order from establishing what it called a“database that the university should submit the documents to him in private. When that failed, the attorney general called on the university to release the documents to the newspaper with the same standard.

However, the legal dispute was in certain ways disagreeable. Although the records have already been disclosed, the university cannot be compelled to release them. Then the newspaper, following the law, made the only order from establishing what it called a“database that the university should submit the documents to him in private. When that failed, the attorney general called on the university to release the documents to the newspaper with the same standard.

However, the legal dispute was in certain ways disagreeable. Although the records have already been disclosed, the university cannot be compelled to release them. Then the newspaper, following the law, made the only order from establishing what it called a“database that the university should submit the documents to him in private. When that failed, the attorney general called on the university to release the documents to the newspaper with the same standard.

However, the legal dispute was in certain ways disagreeable. Although the records have already been disclosed, the university cannot be compelled to release them. Then the newspaper, following the law, made the only order from establishing what it called a“database that the university should submit the documents to him in private. When that failed, the attorney general called on the university to release the documents to the newspaper with the same standard.