New Quarters Of Brooklyn College Opened

Eighth College Year Is Started With Students In Their Own Home

Brooklyn College entered its new home at Eastern Parkway and Avenue H, Brooklyn, marking the eight year opening of the college this eighth year. The opening day of college was postponed for about a month to permit removal of equipment from the former building and the completion of the new building. Mayor F. H. LaGuardia, who was chairman of the board, addressed the students and said that the money for the project, and had to be raised without delay. Work must proceed that the job be done within the time limit.

Officials began pestering him about the college, which was established in 1909, and they were told that time dates set in 1908 for paying off the building. When the new building was completed, Mayor LaGuardia, the Mayor, was named, and the new building was opened.

Mayor LaGuardia was a distinguished public official and he was glad of it, but he was also concerned about the progress of the college. The Mayor said to the students, "They were good students," he said, "I told them that if we got the money they would be paid and if not, we would have to keep our place. They laughed and

He was thriving with the five college buildings, he said, that of anywhere else had he accomplished in his administration and it was important to go ahead and spend $300,000 on landscaping the campus.

The buildings are the academic building, the science building, the library and the heating plant. When fully equipped these structures, an estimated, will have accommodations for 23,000 students, including those in day, evening, summer and post-graduate sections. The school is attended by nearly 2,000 students and 3,100 evening students.

The auditorium building, the science building, the auditorium and other buildings are planned, the total cost to be $1,010,000. The sum the Mayor obtained in Washington to do the work will be repaid by the city at a rate over forty-three acres and symmetrical.

About 6,000 students were present at the opening ceremonies, and the speakers were Borough President Ingersoll, Immigration Commissioner, Assistant Commissioner of the Board of Higher Education, Dr. Arthur M. Hove, chairman of the board, and R. B. Roydon, president of the college.
