The war on higher education is now underway.

Aldemaro Romero Jr.
CUNY Bernard M Baruch College

How does access to this work benefit you? Let us know!
Follow this and additional works at: https://academicworks.cuny.edu/bb_pubs
Part of the Higher Education Commons

Recommended Citation
Romero, A. 2017. The war on higher education is now underway. The Edwardsville Intelligencer 7 August 2017, p. 3.
The war on high education is now underway

In 1969, President Richard Nixon formally declared a “war on drugs” that would be directed to combat the use of illegal drugs in the U.S. and other “war[s],” such as the “war on guns” or “war on crime” have come to signify major efforts by the federal government against something it perceives as a threat. In part, this article in column by column "How to win the war on drugs,"3 suggests that we may need to turn our attention more directly to the larger war on the federal government against higher education. Now, in the last two weeks, we have seen signs of that war in the inspector general’s report on the Department of Education, which revealed that some of the basic tenets of those colleges and universities have been compromised. In addition to efforts by state legislators in Iowa and Ohio to reduce funding to public universities and the FBI’s investigation into federal funding to universities in this county, some of the most remarkable stories are from the local department of higher education. In this article, we will examine the war on higher education, its origins, and the strategies that the federal government is employing to win this war.

In 1969, President Richard Nixon formally declared a “war on drugs” that would be directed to combat the use of illegal drugs in the U.S. and other “war[s],” such as the “war on guns” or “war on crime” have come to signify major efforts by the federal government against something it perceives as a threat. In part, this article in column by column "How to win the war on drugs,"3 suggests that we may need to turn our attention more directly to the larger war on the federal government against higher education. Now, in the last two weeks, we have seen signs of that war in the inspector general’s report on the Department of Education, which revealed that some of the basic tenets of those colleges and universities have been compromised. In addition to efforts by state legislators in Iowa and Ohio to reduce funding to public universities and the FBI’s investigation into federal funding to universities in this county, some of the most remarkable stories are from the local department of higher education. In this article, we will examine the war on higher education, its origins, and the strategies that the federal government is employing to win this war.

In 1969, President Richard Nixon formally declared a “war on drugs” that would be directed to combat the use of illegal drugs in the U.S. and other “war[s],” such as the “war on guns” or “war on crime” have come to signify major efforts by the federal government against something it perceives as a threat. In part, this article in column by column "How to win the war on drugs,"3 suggests that we may need to turn our attention more directly to the larger war on the federal government against higher education. Now, in the last two weeks, we have seen signs of that war in the inspector general’s report on the Department of Education, which revealed that some of the basic tenets of those colleges and universities have been compromised. In addition to efforts by state legislators in Iowa and Ohio to reduce funding to public universities and the FBI’s investigation into federal funding to universities in this county, some of the most remarkable stories are from the local department of higher education. In this article, we will examine the war on higher education, its origins, and the strategies that the federal government is employing to win this war.

In 1969, President Richard Nixon formally declared a “war on drugs” that would be directed to combat the use of illegal drugs in the U.S. and other “war[s],” such as the “war on guns” or “war on crime” have come to signify major efforts by the federal government against something it perceives as a threat. In part, this article in column by column "How to win the war on drugs,"3 suggests that we may need to turn our attention more directly to the larger war on the federal government against higher education. Now, in the last two weeks, we have seen signs of that war in the inspector general’s report on the Department of Education, which revealed that some of the basic tenets of those colleges and universities have been compromised. In addition to efforts by state legislators in Iowa and Ohio to reduce funding to public universities and the FBI’s investigation into federal funding to universities in this county, some of the most remarkable stories are from the local department of higher education. In this article, we will examine the war on higher education, its origins, and the strategies that the federal government is employing to win this war.

In 1969, President Richard Nixon formally declared a “war on drugs” that would be directed to combat the use of illegal drugs in the U.S. and other “war[s],” such as the “war on guns” or “war on crime” have come to signify major efforts by the federal government against something it perceives as a threat. In part, this article in column by column "How to win the war on drugs,"3 suggests that we may need to turn our attention more directly to the larger war on the federal government against higher education. Now, in the last two weeks, we have seen signs of that war in the inspector general’s report on the Department of Education, which revealed that some of the basic tenets of those colleges and universities have been compromised. In addition to efforts by state legislators in Iowa and Ohio to reduce funding to public universities and the FBI’s investigation into federal funding to universities in this county, some of the most remarkable stories are from the local department of higher education. In this article, we will examine the war on higher education, its origins, and the strategies that the federal government is employing to win this war.

In 1969, President Richard Nixon formally declared a “war on drugs” that would be directed to combat the use of illegal drugs in the U.S. and other “war[s],” such as the “war on guns” or “war on crime” have come to signify major efforts by the federal government against something it perceives as a threat. In part, this article in column by column "How to win the war on drugs,"3 suggests that we may need to turn our attention more directly to the larger war on the federal government against higher education. Now, in the last two weeks, we have seen signs of that war in the inspector general’s report on the Department of Education, which revealed that some of the basic tenets of those colleges and universities have been compromised. In addition to efforts by state legislators in Iowa and Ohio to reduce funding to public universities and the FBI’s investigation into federal funding to universities in this county, some of the most remarkable stories are from the local department of higher education. In this article, we will examine the war on higher education, its origins, and the strategies that the federal government is employing to win this war.

In 1969, President Richard Nixon formally declared a “war on drugs” that would be directed to combat the use of illegal drugs in the U.S. and other “war[s],” such as the “war on guns” or “war on crime” have come to signify major efforts by the federal government against something it perceives as a threat. In part, this article in column by column "How to win the war on drugs,"3 suggests that we may need to turn our attention more directly to the larger war on the federal government against higher education. Now, in the last two weeks, we have seen signs of that war in the inspector general’s report on the Department of Education, which revealed that some of the basic tenets of those colleges and universities have been compromised. In addition to efforts by state legislators in Iowa and Ohio to reduce funding to public universities and the FBI’s investigation into federal funding to universities in this county, some of the most remarkable stories are from the local department of higher education. In this article, we will examine the war on higher education, its origins, and the strategies that the federal government is employing to win this war.

In 1969, President Richard Nixon formally declared a “war on drugs” that would be directed to combat the use of illegal drugs in the U.S. and other “war[s],” such as the “war on guns” or “war on crime” have come to signify major efforts by the federal government against something it perceives as a threat. In part, this article in column by column "How to win the war on drugs,"3 suggests that we may need to turn our attention more directly to the larger war on the federal government against higher education. Now, in the last two weeks, we have seen signs of that war in the inspector general’s report on the Department of Education, which revealed that some of the basic tenets of those colleges and universities have been compromised. In addition to efforts by state legislators in Iowa and Ohio to reduce funding to public universities and the FBI’s investigation into federal funding to universities in this county, some of the most remarkable stories are from the local department of higher education. In this article, we will examine the war on higher education, its origins, and the strategies that the federal government is employing to win this war.