The war on higher education is now underway.

Aldemaro Romero Jr.
CUNY Bernard M Baruch College
In 1969, President Richard Nixon formally declared a "war on drugs" that would be directed to combat the use of illegal drugs in the U.S. and the other "war," the "war on drugs." It was in response to the drug problem that the federal government passed a series of laws that made it more difficult to buy and sell drugs, and it was the same kind of thinking that led to the war on education. The war on education is now underway.

In this article in the "Frontline" section of the "Education" department, I have written about some of the recent developments in education that are likely to have an impact on our country's schools and universities.

In particular, I have written about new federal regulations that are designed to increase the number of minority students enrolled in college and the number of minority students who graduate from college.

I have also written about the growing use of technology in the classroom and the ways in which technology is changing the way students learn.

Finally, I have written about the role of parents in the education of their children and the ways in which parents can help their children succeed in school.

I hope that my articles will provide you with some interesting ideas and information about the state of education in the United States today.

The war on high education is now underway.