Higher education has had better years

We are all familiar with the maladies that have affected higher education over the past few years: budget cuts, tuition increases, declines in endowment, bad press, etc. But was there something else that made things particularly worse in 2017? Plenty.

The bad news started with reports of increasing censorship and intimidation exercised upon college campuses. For example, it was reported on campuses of the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign and the University of Missouri in Columbia, Mo., that students were being censored and intimidated.

In other reports, it was revealed that several students were being disciplined for expressing unpopular views.

The bad news continued with reports of increasing tuition costs and decreased funding for public universities.

The bad news also continued with reports of increasing numbers of students defaulting on their student loans.

The bad news also continued with reports of increasing numbers of students being denied admission to their preferred universities.

The bad news also continued with reports of increasing numbers of students being denied financial aid.

The bad news also continued with reports of increasing numbers of students being denied admission to their preferred schools.
