One question that is commonly asked is whether people who pursue a career in the humanities (like philosophy, literature, or history) are likely to find jobs. It is often assumed that the humanities major is not going to do well for a living. However, research has shown that humanities graduates are just as likely to succeed as their non-humanities educated counterparts. In fact, many liberal arts colleges are adding pre-professional programs to their curricula in response to student demand. This shows that the idea that a humanities graduate is not going to be able to find a job is likely to be a myth.

Another question that is commonly asked is what a humanities degree is worth pursuing because their parent's often tell them not to pursue such majors worth pursuing because their parents often tell them not to pursue such a degree. However, many studies have shown that humanities graduates are in high demand in a variety of fields. This is another important point to remember, such as "Following a humanities career will most likely fulfill your calling to a humanities career will most likely fulfill your calling to share your passion with others who are interested in the humanities."
