In the last few years a ghost has been haunting many countries. Whether it’s Trumpmania in the United States and UK, the League Party in Italy, the Podemos in Spain, or the Venezuelan Chavismo, they all share a common element of populism and nationalism.

The rise of nationalism,-by the rejection of the establishment, the so-called privileged elites. Nationalism has come to define a movement that promotes the alleged superiority of a particular nation or group of nations by virtue of geography, culture, or ethnicity. As nationalism gains importance, it is often the case that throughout time major prophecies are made and these prophecies can be dangerous.

The rise of nationalism can be dangerous because of the nature of nationalism. They can be used to create an “us versus them” mentality, and can lead to the creation of false flag narratives. They can also be used to create a sense of national pride.

What is going on today is a continuation of this cycle. Scientific facts are being dismissed and science is being ignored in favor of the tenets of those ideologically driven politicians. They can be used to spread false narratives and they can be used to spread lies.

And look at the consequences. Nationalism has, on one hand, led to great advancements. It has led to the creation of nations, to the creation of science, to the creation of art. But it has also led to great destruction. It has led to war, it has led to genocide, it has led to the destruction of civilizations.

Then we have had the economic elites, people who have been the driving force behind the rise in globalization. They are the people who have returned in the long-waning of the seasons of which they are a part.
