Iran Deal Will Impact Higher Ed

Aldemaro Romero Jr.
Five without board consideration

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo. (AP) — Missouri Gov. Eric Greitens signed a law Monday to allow his nominees to the State Board of Education to begin to serve, despite resistance from board members who said the appointments were invalid.

Some senators had blocked confirmation of the appointments because Greitens had not hired someone to provide a permanent ban on the use of public funds.

Several board members blocked the confirmation of the appointments because Greitens had not hired someone to provide a permanent ban on the use of public funds.

The new law will allow five of Greitens' nominees to begin their terms on Monday, while the other two have been blocked by the board.

Greitens signed the law Monday to allow the appointments to proceed, despite opposition from board members who said the appointments were invalid.

The appointments were made without the usual process of public hearing and were confirmed by the board last month.

The new law will allow five of Greitens' nominees to begin their terms on Monday, while the other two have been blocked by the board.

The appointments were made without the usual process of public hearing and were confirmed by the board last month.

The new law will allow five of Greitens' nominees to begin their terms on Monday, while the other two have been blocked by the board.

The appointments were made without the usual process of public hearing and were confirmed by the board last month.

The new law will allow five of Greitens' nominees to begin their terms on Monday, while the other two have been blocked by the board.

The appointments were made without the usual process of public hearing and were confirmed by the board last month.

The new law will allow five of Greitens' nominees to begin their terms on Monday, while the other two have been blocked by the board.

The appointments were made without the usual process of public hearing and were confirmed by the board last month.