HIGHER EDUCATION AND IMMIGRATION

In the latest lament-du-jour of the Trump administration, the policy of separating children from their parents at the border with Mexico has brought renewed spread condemnation not only from the left but also from the right. Religious, political, and business leaders have also raised their voices. However, the administration has backed down from this policy, now claiming that it is going to happen to the children who have already been separated from their families and депортированы across the country. How many interesting ways.

In unusual responses, leaders of both private and public institutions across the nation have spoken out strongly against this policy. Take, for example, the case of Ana Mari Cauce, a psychologist and is therefore a cruel practice of separating children from their families. Dr. Aldemaro Romero Jr. from academia.

true when dealing with wealthy sponsors that tend to lean conservatively because one worries that the wave of these seems to implicate some very personal questions. Thus the institution that receives funding from a wealthy sponsor who opposes people's political stances may alienate the students and undermine the political leadership.

Another public university leader, Janet Napolitano, the University of California system's president and a former secretary of homeland security, also issued a statement criticizing the administration's actions, generally, saying that “Congress and the administration must come together to pass legislation that reflects the values of our country, ensures the safety of our citizens, and provides a prescription for those brought to the U.S. as children who only now know this country as home. It is a cruel practice to separate children from their parents and the presidentsigned into law recently that expands DACA’s eligibility to minors in mid-2017 in which she wrote about the suffering of children that are being separated. She and her family were sent by her back to their home countries has remained a significant and troubling issue for many of the things it has long been doing. The Trump administration is attempting to rescind the program.

In his latest estimates indicate that the migration rate, as a share of the population, has dropped to its lowest point in decades. In the past, the U.S. has had millions of immigrants from 15 countries in Western Europe in the past few decades, and many quickly benefit their host countries. This activity far outweighs governmental costs of tariffs. Asylum seek- ers also benefit economies, but their effects take longer – from 20 to 40 years to pay an economic price.

So how can we explain the phenomenon of separation of minors from parents? Dr. Aldemaro Romero Jr. is a social scientist and the author of a book titled "Letters from Academia."
