The recent announcement of the July 1 retirement of Pres-ident’s John F. Kennedy has raised many questions about how it was made and why. One of these questions is whether the decision was a result of President Trump’s pressure or of Kennedy’s own desire to step down. Let’s briefly explore some of these possibilities.

First of all, it’s important to recognize that affirmative action has always been a hotly contested issue between conservatives and liberals when it comes to how it should be applied. In the past, when affirmative action was used as a way to bridge the gap between different groups, it was often seen as a way to level the playing field. However, in recent years, some have argued that affirmative action is no longer necessary because of the advancements made in the civil rights movement. Others believe that affirmative action is still necessary as a way to ensure that everyone has an equal opportunity to succeed.

In order to examine these issues, we will begin by looking at the decisions made by the Supreme Court in the past and how those decisions have affected higher education. We will then consider the arguments made by both sides and try to determine what the future of affirmative action might look like.

As we have seen, affirmative action has played a significant role in higher education. It has given many students the opportunity to attend schools that they might not have been able to afford otherwise. However, it has also been a controversial issue, with some arguing that it is unfair to give preference to certain groups over others.

In the end, it is clear that affirmative action is a complex issue that requires careful consideration. While it may have been necessary in the past, it is important to consider whether it is still necessary today. By examining the arguments made by both sides, we can better understand the challenges that lie ahead.
