Increasing Drug Arrests after 1980 had Disproportionate Effect on Women

by Jeffrey A. Butts

The number of drug-related arrests reported by U.S. law enforcement agencies increased sharply between 1980 and 1995, and for some groups the volume of arrests did not decline significantly between 1995 and 2010.

The largest relative growth in drug arrests occurred among adult women, especially those charged with drug possession offenses rather than sales or manufacture. Drug arrests involving male offenders still outnumbered those involving females in 2010, but arrests of women increased faster.

Between 1980 and 1995, possession arrests involving women over the age of 24 grew 638 percent, or nearly double the rate of increase among men the same age (326 percent).

The growth in female possession arrests outpaced the male rate among offenders ages 18-24 as well. Arrests of younger adult women increased 64 percent between 1980 and 1995, and continued to grow 101 percent between 1995 and 2010.

Change in Arrests for Drug Offenses: 1980-2010

When arrests are viewed as rates — arrests per 100,000 — the relative growth in drug arrests among adult women is plainly visible, especially in arrests involving drug possession charges. In this way, the expansion of drug arrests after 1980 had a disproportionate effect on women.
