Dr. Erin Heil in her office on the SLUE campus.

What if we are going to see more terrorist movements or university-based movements you are going to see a more middle class movement that is not as sophisticated as some of those other individuals.

For Heil the middle class is largely responsible for the ineptness and skewed view we have of terrorism as a phenomenon.

Alton and Edwardsville are just wonderful – thoroughly enjoyable.

Terrorism is a final tactic for an oppressed group to try and get someone's attention. They have no military, they don't have a lot of money, they don't have a lot of support on terrorist tactics and a lot of the times a terrorist is just a common criminal.

We also tend to define terrorism differently depending upon the historical and political context. Heil explained. Although the British, Germans, Americans, Algerians have biographies, they are going to define terrorism in different ways depending on where they are.

All of these things are just a part of what Heil says is becoming a national phenomenon than most people realize.
