As African-American authors have become more powerful in the literary world, so have the number of scholars who study them. In addition to Brooks, a professor at the University of Iowa, there are many, many more who are influenced by African-American literature, and with it, the number of scholars who study it. The selection committee at the Pulitzer Prize has also become more inclusive of African-American authors, and this has resulted in a greater number of scholars who study them. Indeed, it is not uncommon for a scholar to have studied African-American literature for many years. In many ways, this is a great development, as it allows scholars to explore the rich and diverse experiences of African-American authors in a more meaningful way. However, there is still much work to be done in this area, and it is important that we continue to support the work of African-American authors and their scholarship. In the meantime, it is important to recognize the contributions of African-American authors and their scholarship to the literary world.
