2015

Claims of demise of humanities greatly exaggerated

Aldemaro Romero Jr.
CUNY Bernard M Baruch College

How does access to this work benefit you? Let us know!

Follow this and additional works at: https://academicworks.cuny.edu/bb_pubs

Part of the Higher Education Commons

Recommended Citation
https://academicworks.cuny.edu/bb_pubs/886

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Baruch College at CUNY Academic Works. It has been accepted for inclusion in Publications and Research by an authorized administrator of CUNY Academic Works. For more information, please contact AcademicWorks@cuny.edu.
One debate that has taken place over the last few years in higher education has been about the future of the humanities. They are broadly defined as the study of disciplines that study human culture and include literature, linguistics, philosophy, history, art, and music. Many argue that these disciplines are essential for a well-rounded education and provide a foundation for critical thinking and problem-solving skills. Others argue that the humanities are not as important as the sciences and engineering, which are seen as more practical and useful in today's job market.

As a graduate student in the humanities, I have often wondered about the future of my field. I have attended conferences and workshops that focus on the importance of the humanities, but I have also heard discussions about the need for more practical skills. As I think about my career, I wonder if I will be able to find work that combines my love for the humanities with practical skills. I am also concerned about the funding for the humanities, as many universities are cutting back on their programs.

I think it is important for students in the humanities to stay connected to each other and to others in different fields. We need to continue to argue for the importance of the humanities and to find ways to connect with people in other fields. I hope that as students, we can continue to push for the importance of the humanities and to find ways to continue our education even if our fields are not as popular or well-funded as they once were.