A higher education degree is good for your health

Dr. Aldemaro Romero Jr. | Letters from Academia

A few weeks ago Brian Rosenberg, president of Macalester College in St. Paul, Minnesota, where I used to work, was complaining about some of the media criticizing higher education. It is all well and good that he complained about so many articles about postsecondary education that are based on inaccurate and incomplete information. The problem is that there is an entire organization that only publishes articles that are well written and based on research that is supportable in a serious way. Researchers want to know if there was any correlation between levels of educational attainment and mortality, and in this case it was those individuals who had higher levels of education that had a lower mortality rate. Researchers concluded that this finding suggests that higher education is associated with lower mortality rates, which is why the researchers recommended that more people should pursue higher education.

A new study has shown that individuals who have higher levels of education are more likely to have a lower mortality rate. Researchers from a variety of universities concluded that the findings of the study are consistent with previous research that has shown that education is associated with lower mortality rates. This is why the researchers recommended that more people should pursue higher education in order to improve their health outcomes.

The university chose to open a separate school for non-residents. The university has seen an increase in the number of students who are looking for a lower-cost alternative to higher education. This is why the university has decided to open a new school for non-residents to provide a quality education at a lower cost.

Property taxes may rise in Chicago

The 2016 budget for the city of Chicago is projected to increase by approximately 8 percent, driven by a combination of factors including a rise in property values, a decrease in state funding, and an increase in the number of non-taxable properties.
