There are no shortcuts to increasing enrollment...

Colleges and universities are more and more relying on private donations to fill their financial gaps. Some private institutions, even those with large endowments, are finding it increasingly difficult to make ends meet. Despite the fact that many of them, as is the case with public institutions, enroll more than 2,000 students, they know they need a minimum number of students to afford the quality of education.

While many public institutions are increasing their numbers of students, others are going in the opposite direction and shrinking enrollments. The current data collected by the National Center for Education Statistics (part of the U.S. Department of Education), is one of the complicated higher education landscapes.

The reasons for these trends have increased their enrollment by basically increasing their acceptance rates, lowering their standards. They accept more applicants whether they are the best students or not.

This ends up in lower quality overall standards, overall changes the entire educational experiences. Faculty morale suffers when they have to spend more time on remedial courses that help very few students.

They have opted for keeping low tuition and fees even if that means that the discount rates increase. These are not sustainable long-term solutions.

We are now hearing about the privatization of education as a result of enrolment growing down and down, and the end of public institutions, public and private universities losing money. The price of education.

There are no shortcuts to increasing enrollment. We need to keep a higher education relates to demographics. For example, with a higher education becomes a pathway to a better life for everyone who can afford it. The ripple effect of increased enrollments is both measurable and significant. It can be a spiritual lifesaver.

It's an incredible opportunity to help others in need. "There is no downside in my mind. It's an incredible opportunity to help someone in need." Pavelka said.
