College Band Expects Split With R.O.T.C.

Dr. Canssens, Band Director, Decides to Separate

A report has been received that the College band and the R.O.T.C. group are planning to separate. This move was recommended by the President of the College, who feels that such an arrangement will improve the morale of both groups.

The movement to separate is not entirely unexpected. Dr. Canssens, the band director, has been an advocate of such a step for some time. This was particularly the case during the last year of the band's existence, when it was called the R.O.T.C. band. The band, which has been highly successful, is now being called the College band.

The band has been particularly successful in recent years, having won several awards and been invited to perform at various events. It is expected that the band will continue to be successful under the new arrangement.

The decision is expected to have a significant impact on the College and the community at large. The band has been an important part of the College's cultural life, and its breakup is likely to be met with disappointment by many.
