Select BC Summer Farm School Site

Brooklyn College has been offered a site for the "summer school in the country" plan at the State Agricultural and Technical Institute at Morrisville, New York. According to the plan, students will aid in the harvesting of crops, at the same time attend regular college-credit courses in the evenings and on rainy days.

The Faculty Committee on Student Employment with Professor Ralph D. Benedict, as chairman, visited Morrisville last week to investigate the locale, the dormitory and the study facilities, and to confer with school and state officials and with farmers from whom employment would be obtained. The committee was "enthusiastic" about the site, and entirely satisfied with other arrangements.

That there exists a definite need for labor in that area was emphasized by the fact that most of the laborers imported to pick the peas, legumes and snap beans, have been drafted or are working in war plants.

To facilitate the enlistment of student workers, New York State has set up a state-wide program for the placement of food production workers. The legislature has appropriated funds for the transportation of students and the expense of supervision.

Students who desire further information are requested to inquire at the Placement Office.
