The Paper Chase” movie and subsequent TV series featuring Dr. Altemero Romero Jr. are examples of the popularization of law school life by the actor John Cusack. They showed law students studying in a classroom, which is not how actual law schools operate. The teaching of law in these schools started to look more like other university courses, which meant that legal studies began to resemble other academic disciplines. This was a significant reform in legal education. He introduced the concept of a law review, which is now a standard feature in law schools.

Increasing costs, decreasing enrollments and the need to compete for and recruit top students have become of utmost importance when it comes to law schools. This is an indication of the changing approach of how law schools are structured, and it is driven by the desire to improve the education and training of future lawyers.

Today, there are more than 600 law reviews in the United States, and many are published by organizations of students at law schools or bar associations.
