The highlight of the conference was the viewing of the film “White Like Me: Race, Racism and Intersections.” Submitted photos

"We plan to have more dialogue about race at a forum on January 18, 2017, the morning before Pence also supported the controversial "Religious Freedom Restoration Act" enacted last year that critics - including judges in discrimination actions against Hispanic, gay, bisexual and transgender Americans.

"I think of concerns around the topic of white privilege," Frick added, “in the least among those who are privileged, that they will lose their privilege.

"It has been hard for me to maneuver in a system that is not set up for minority students, and especially if you plan to do any kind of research," said Buckley.

"I feel good about the conference. The film selection was very good and it was wonderful that we had such a high turnout to see the film," said Holsed. "I think it was a rolling from the soul and a galvanizing as well as a catalyst for further action on the part of the attendees.

"We need to use it, and leverage it to accommodate the students and the students of color and to make it a tool for doing, but having this initiative is a way to move forward," said Buckley.
