Abortion Exceptionalism and Undue Burden Preemption

Caitlin E. Borgmann*

Abstract

This Article discusses the tendency of some lower federal courts to interpret the undue burden standard of Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey as essentially occupying the field of potential constitutional claims whenever abortion is involved. Thus, where litigants have alleged constitutional claims other than, or in addition to, undue burden violations, courts have either changed how they normally analyze these constitutional claims or they have even completely foreclosed the application of other doctrines on the grounds that the undue burden standard subsumes or displaces these claims. This Article illustrates this phenomenon in the context of three types of non-undue-burden claims that have been asserted against some abortion restrictions: bodily integrity, equal protection, and the right against compelled speech. Undue burden preemption, I argue, flies in the face of the Court's recognition that "[c]ertain wrongs . . . can implicate more than one of the Constitution's commands."¹ Where multiple constitutional violations are alleged, the Court's normal approach is to examine each constitutional provision in turn. There is one well-established exception to this general rule, the "Graham doctrine." This doctrine provides that, when a litigant asserts a substantive due process claim, and where the Court finds that another more specific constitutional provision applies, the Court analyzes the claim under the more specific provision to the exclusion of substantive due process. I. Introduction

“Abortion exceptionalism” is a term that has been used to describe the tendency of legislatures and courts to subject abortion to unique, and uniquely burdensome, rules.² This Article addresses a particular kind of abortion exceptionalism, which I call “undue burden preemption.” Undue burden preemption is a trend in which some lower federal courts interpret the undue burden standard as essentially occupying the field of potential constitutional claims that may be brought against a given abortion restriction.³ Under undue burden preemption, courts

2. See, e.g., Caroline Mala Corbin, Abortion Distortion, 71 WASH. & LEE L. REV. 1175, 1177 (2014) (describing abortion exceptionalism as courts’ failure to apply “normal doctrine” when abortion is at issue); Ian Vandelwalker, Abortion and Informed Consent, 19 MICH. J. GENDER & L. 1, 3 (2012) (describing abortion exceptionalism as singling “abortion . . . out for more restrictive government regulation as compared to other, similar procedures”). Abortion rights opponents have used the term in the opposite sense, to suggest that courts have unfairly privileged abortion over competing constitutional rights. See “Abortion Exceptionalism” to be Reviewed by U.S. Supreme Court, LIFE LEGAL DEF. FOUND. (Sept. 12, 2013), <http://lldf.org/abortion-exceptionalism-to-be-reviewed-by-u-s-supreme-court/> (last visited Jan. 25, 2014) (describing abortion exceptionalism as “the idea that abortion clinics somehow deserve special treatment in the free speech context”) (on file with the Washington and Lee Law Review).

addressing the constitutionality of abortion restrictions either refuse to analyze claims other than undue burden claims on the grounds that the undue burden standard displaces the other claims, or they interpret the undue burden standard as supplanting or altering the normal doctrine applied to the separate claims.⁴ Undue burden preemption is an aberration in constitutional adjudication. Normally, when a litigant alleges that a particular governmental action violates multiple constitutional rights, the courts analyze each alleged violation separately under the relevant doctrine.⁵

The only area in which the United States Supreme Court has allowed a particular constitutional claim to “preempt” another separate claim is that of substantive due process. Under the “Graham doctrine,” as it is known, when a litigant asserts a substantive due process claim, and where the Court finds that another more specific constitutional provision applies (for instance, the Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable searches and seizures), the Court analyzes the claim under the more specific provision to the exclusion of substantive due process.⁶ Undue burden preemption is the opposite of the Graham doctrine. Whereas the Graham doctrine prefers a more specific constitutional claim to a more general one, undue burden preemption rejects, or waters down, more specific constitutional claims (or, in the case of bodily integrity, an equally nonspecific constitutional claim) in favor of the notoriously nonspecific undue burden standard.⁷ Thus, under Graham, undue burden preemption is still jurisprudentially indefensible.

This Article is organized into three parts. Part II describes the prevailing approach to adjudicating constitutional claims, along with the single established exception to this approach, the Graham doctrine. Part III explains the concept of undue burden preemption, illustrating its use in three doctrinal contexts: bodily integrity, equal protection, and free speech. Part IV critiques undue burden preemption as a misguided and dangerous expansion of Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey's⁸ undue burden standard, one that turns the Graham doctrine on its head.

II. The Prevailing Approach

The Supreme Court has long recognized that a particular governmental act can implicate more than one constitutional right.⁹ When this is the case, claimants can assert multiple constitutional claims, and courts will consider each in turn, applying the relevant constitutional doctrine to each claim separately.¹⁰ The Court has expressly acknowledged this prevailing approach on more than one occasion. In United States v. James Daniel Good Real Property,¹¹ the Court addressed whether the government's seizure of the claimant's property without prior notice and a hearing violated procedural due process.¹² The Government argued that it need only comply with the requirements of the Fourth Amendment.¹³ The Court agreed that the Fourth Amendment applied to the seizure but declared that this was not the "sole constitutional provision in question."¹⁴ The Court explained: "We have rejected the view that the applicability of one constitutional amendment pre-empts the guarantees of another."¹⁵ The Court in Good Real Property relied upon Soldal v. Cook County,¹⁶ a property seizure case in which the Court had made the identical point.¹⁷ In Soldal, the Court stated: “Certain wrongs affect more than a single right and, accordingly, can implicate more than one of the Constitution’s commands. Where such multiple violations are alleged, we are not in the habit of identifying as a preliminary matter the claim’s ‘dominant’ character. Rather, we examine each constitutional provision in turn.”¹⁸

The Court’s recognition of the prevailing approach in Good Real Property and Soldal merely makes explicit what courts have always done. Courts routinely address, seriatim, different constitutional claims addressing the same governmental action. They do not construe one applicable constitutional provision to preempt another, nor do they force claimants to litigate solely under the doctrine of the Court’s choice. In Doe v. Bolton,¹⁹ for example, the Supreme Court considered claims that various Georgia abortion restrictions violated not only the right to privacy but also procedural due process, the Privileges and Immunities Clause, and equal protection.²⁰ The Ninth Circuit in a recent case addressing a sex offender registration law separately considered, and analyzed under the respective doctrines, claims that the law violated the Double Jeopardy or Ex Post Facto Clauses; procedural due process; and the Contract Clause.²¹

James Daniel Good Real Prop.*, 510 U.S. 43, 49–50 (1993) (relying on Soldal to support the fact that the Court “ha[s] rejected the view that the applicability of one constitutional amendment pre-empts the guarantees of another”); see also Soldal, 506 U.S. at 60 (noting that the Court “granted certiorari to consider whether the seizure and removal of the Soldals’ trailer home implicated their Fourth Amendment rights”).

There is one well-established—if not exactly well-known²²—exception to this general rule. This exception applies when a substantive due process claim is asserted. Under the exception, the Court applies other constitutional provisions to the exclusion of substantive due process where it finds that the other provisions supply an “explicit textual source of constitutional protection.”²³ This exception is known as the “Graham doctrine,” from one of the early cases to announce the doctrine, Graham v. Connor.²⁴ In Graham, the Court held that claims of excessive force in the course of an arrest or investigatory stop must be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment, rather than the “more generalized notion of ‘substantive due process.’”²⁵ While Graham could be interpreted as applying only to excessive force cases, or perhaps to the Fourth Amendment context more generally,²⁶ the Court has more recently applied the doctrine to the Takings Clause²⁷ and to the Eighth Amendment.²⁸ It has suggested in dicta that it applies to the Fifth Amendment Self-

Incrimination Clause as well.²⁹ Some lower federal courts have interpreted Graham as establishing the general principle that whenever another amendment provides “an explicit textual source of constitutional protection,”³⁰ that provision must be applied to the exclusion of substantive due process.³¹

It is important to recognize that Graham—whatever its scope—displaces substantive due process claims only, and then only when an express textual provision is applicable. The apparent underlying premise of the Graham doctrine is that substantive due process is murky, lacks clear guideposts, and addresses unenumerated rights.³² Therefore, if the Court has explicit constitutional text to apply, it prefers to do so.³³ The City of Sun Valley*, 506 F.3d 851, 855–56 (9th Cir. 2007) (finding that “the Fifth Amendment would preclude a due process challenge only if the alleged conduct is actually covered by [the Amendment]” and “it is no longer possible . . . to read Armendariz as imposing a blanket obstacle to all substantive due process challenges to land use regulation”). The Supreme Court itself has not consistently applied Graham this broadly, however. See Massaro, supra note 22, at 1108–09, 1113 n.132 (pointing out that the Supreme Court has not extended the Graham doctrine to Takings Clause cases or in some criminal procedure contexts).

32. See Graham, 490 U.S. at 395 (“Because the Fourth Amendment provides an explicit textual source of constitutional protection against this sort of physically intrusive governmental conduct, that Amendment, not the more generalized notion of ‘substantive due process,’ must be the guide for analyzing these claims.”); Massaro, supra note 22, at 1115 (“The Court has since cited only judicial authority concerns of vagueness, open-ended provisions, and the absence of meaningful judicial standards in explaining Graham.”).

33. The Graham doctrine has been criticized on various grounds. See, e.g., Caitlin E. Borgmann, The Constitutionality of Government-Imposed Bodily Intrusions, 2014 U. ILL. L. REV. (forthcoming 2014) (manuscript at 51–56)

Graham doctrine does not foreclose the possibility that a wrong could implicate multiple constitutional claims.³⁴ Moreover, nothing about the Graham doctrine suggests that courts should interpret an unenumerated, substantive due process right—like the right to privacy—as preempting either a textually grounded constitutional claim³⁵ or another unenumerated right.³⁶

III. Undue Burden Preemption

Before the Supreme Court established a new standard for evaluating abortion restrictions in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, such restrictions were analyzed under strict scrutiny, pursuant to the framework set out in Roe v. Wade.³⁷ Casey changed the Roe framework in several significant ways, which some lower courts have interpreted as impelling the concept of undue burden preemption. First, the Court recognized the state's interest in the embryo or fetus as a valid basis for abortion regulation throughout pregnancy,³⁸ not just after viability as Roe had held.³⁹ Second, the Court lowered the standard from strict scrutiny to the more nebulous undue burden standard, which asks whether a law has the purpose or effect of placing a substantial obstacle in the path of a woman seeking an abortion.⁴⁰

Since Casey, some lower courts seem to view the undue burden standard as preempting nearly all other substantive claims that might otherwise be brought against an abortion restriction.⁴¹ The Fifth Circuit suggests that this is because Casey struck a delicate balance between the woman's rights and the interest of the state in the embryo or fetus in the pre-viability period of pregnancy, and it regards other substantive claims attacking abortion restrictions as disturbing this equilibrium.⁴² The Fifth Circuit adheres to this view even when the separate claims are asserting the rights of entirely different parties (doctors, rather than patients, for example).⁴³ Three particular doctrines that different courts have found to be preempted by the Providers Performing Abortion Servs. v. Lakey*, 667 F.3d 570, 580–84 (5th Cir. 2013) (applying the void for vagueness doctrine as a standalone inquiry); *Planned Parenthood Sw. Ohio Region v. undue burden standard are bodily integrity,⁴⁴ equal protection,⁴⁵ and compelled speech.⁴⁶ Because the Casey joint opinion did not analyze the abortion restrictions at issue there under bodily integrity or the equal protection doctrine,⁴⁷ it is difficult to argue that undue burden preemption in these contexts is compelled by Casey. Nevertheless some lower courts have, sua sponte, concluded that the undue burden standard displaces or limits these claims.⁴⁸ Compelled speech, on the other hand, was addressed in Casey, albeit briefly.⁴⁹ Analyzing undue burden preemption in the compelled speech context requires examining Casey's own confusing treatment of the compelled speech claim there, as well as lower courts' interpretations of Casey as supporting undue burden preemption of compelled speech claims.

A. Bodily Integrity

The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals' treatment of a bodily integrity claim against an abortion restriction offers perhaps the most straightforward example of undue burden preemption. In Planned Parenthood Southwestern Ohio Region v. DeWine,⁵⁰ the Sixth Circuit in effect applied undue burden preemption when it upheld a state restriction on medication abortion.⁵¹ The Sixth Circuit reasoned, in part, that bodily integrity claims, which would normally be subject to strict scrutiny, should be analyzed under Casey's undue burden standard when asserted against abortion requirements.⁵²

In 2000, the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) had approved the drug mifepristone—also known as RU-486 or the early abortion pill—for use in the United States.⁵³ The FDA approved a specific regimen for administering mifepristone, but soon thereafter abortion providers began to change the protocol.⁵⁴ These adaptations were based on evidence from clinical trials that suggested, among other things, that lower dosages of the drug were equally effective and that the drug could safely and effectively be administered later in pregnancy.⁵⁵ This type of “off-label” use of a drug is routine and completely legal.⁵⁶

In 2004, however, Ohio enacted a law requiring abortion providers to adhere to the original FDA-approved protocol.⁵⁷ Planned Parenthood⁵⁸ argued that this law unnecessarily required higher dosages of medication with no medical justification, and that the protocol increased the costs of abortion.⁵⁹ The plaintiffs challenged the requirement as unconstitutionally vague, a violation of women’s bodily integrity, and an undue burden.⁶⁰

Addressing the bodily intrusion claim, the Sixth Circuit recognized that “individuals possess a constitutional right to be free from forcible physical intrusions of their bodies against their will, absent a compelling state interest.”⁶¹ However, the court found that the strict scrutiny that courts normally apply to violations of bodily integrity does not apply to a bodily intrusion that occurs in the context of abortion.⁶² The Sixth Circuit seemed to view the plaintiffs as attempting to cheat by invoking a claim that would merit higher scrutiny than the undue burden standard:

Although we understand why Planned Parenthood took this approach—requiring the government to show a compelling state interest for the Act would relieve Planned Parenthood of its obligation to show an undue burden on the right to choose an abortion—this argument is unconvincing. “Strict scrutiny, of course, no longer applies to abortion legislation.”⁶³

The Sixth Circuit in DeWine regarded “[g]overnment restrictions on abortions [as] a form of interference with the right to bodily integrity and control over an individual’s person,”⁶⁴ but it interpreted the undue burden standard as swallowing the bodily integrity analysis.⁶⁵ Thus, the court said, the plaintiffs retained a viable right to bodily integrity claim, but “the analysis will map the undue-burden framework.”⁶⁶

By lumping together all “restrictions on abortion” as triggering (only) the undue burden standard, the Sixth Circuit failed to recognize that the bodily integrity claim alleged in DeWine was of a different quality than one focused on whether a restriction places a “substantial obstacle” in the path of a woman seeking an abortion, as the undue burden inquiry examines.⁶⁷ The right to bodily integrity is a broad umbrella that encompasses the right to affirmative decision-making about one’s body as well as the right to repel unwanted bodily intrusions.⁶⁸ Abortion restrictions may encompass the former if they excessively burden a woman’s ability to choose abortion.⁶⁹ In DeWine, the specific bodily intrusion claim made about medication abortion was of the latter category; the plaintiffs argued that the restriction unnecessarily forced certain women, who would otherwise be eligible for medication abortions under the new protocol, to undergo surgery as the only means to obtaining an abortion.⁷⁰ As the court recognized, “forcible physical intrusions of the body by their government” are normally subject to strict scrutiny.⁷¹ These claims are not the same as a claim of denied or burdened access to abortion.

The difference between the two claims should be clear from the court’s separate discussion of the plaintiffs’ undue burden claim. Both the majority and the dissenting judge discussed the undue burden claim in terms of how the law burdened a woman’s access to abortion, asking such questions as whether otherwise-eligible women who could not obtain a medication abortion because of the law would forgo abortion altogether, and how much the FDA protocol increased abortion costs as compared with the new protocols.⁷² Nevertheless, the court viewed this very distinct type of claim as preempting the claim that the state should not be allowed to effectively force a woman to undergo surgery, when another safe medical option is available, absent a compelling reason.⁷³

B. Equal Protection

There are a number of different types of equal protection claims that might be brought against abortion restrictions. First, claims may be divided based on whose rights are being asserted: abortion providers or women seeking abortions.⁷⁴ Next, equal protection claims asserting women's rights can be of two varieties: equal protection claims premised on abortion as a fundamental right ("fundamental rights equal protection claims"), and equal protection claims based on sex discrimination (sex discrimination claims). Both of the latter types of equal protection claims have fallen prey to undue burden preemption. The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals has interpreted fundamental rights equal protection claims in the abortion context as being subsumed within the undue burden standard. In Planned Parenthood of Mid-Missouri and Eastern Kansas, Inc. v. Dempsey,⁷⁵ the plaintiff challenged on equal protection grounds, among others, a Missouri law preventing abortion providers from receiving state family planning funds.⁷⁶ The court disagreed that the law should be subject to strict scrutiny, noting that "[a]ny constitutional right of clinics to provide abortion services . . . is derived directly from women's constitutional right to choose abortion."⁷⁷ It noted that Casey established a new standard of review for abortion regulations.⁷⁸ The court then shifted to an analysis indistinguishable from the undue burden standard, including an assessment of whether the law would "have the effect of placing an undue burden on women seeking abortion services" and concluding that it would not.⁷⁹

Similarly, in addressing targeted regulations of abortion providers (TRAP laws), both the Fourth and Ninth Circuit Courts of Appeals have held that equal protection claims premised on abortion as a constitutionally protected right "collapse[] with the undue burden claim."⁸⁰ This, the courts maintain, is because Clinic, Inc., and Dr. William Lynn . . . brought this action seeking a declaratory judgment that Regulation 61-12 is unconstitutional on its face because, among other things, it would violate their . . . equal protection rights, as well as those of their patients.").

“Casey defined a new standard of judicial review for determining when courts can recognize burdens on [the abortion] right as unconstitutional, . . . replacing the traditional scrutiny analysis with the undue burden test.”⁸¹

It is true that equal protection claims that challenge classifications implicating the exercise of a constitutional right often receive the same level of scrutiny traditionally applied to a direct violation of that right.⁸² But this does not mean that courts evaluating such equal protection claims should simply act as though the claimant has alleged a violation of the substantive right. An equal protection claim makes a distinct assertion, namely that the differential treatment of the plaintiff is unconstitutional.⁸³ The level of protection afforded to the underlying right helps to determine the level of scrutiny the court should apply in determining whether the plaintiff is correct,⁸⁴ but it is not always appropriate to apply precisely the same test to a claim of equal protection as would be applied to a claim directly attacking a violation of the underlying right. This is particularly so where the test applicable to the underlying substantive right is one that focuses specifically on the extent of interference with the plaintiff's exercise of that right. The undue burden standard, as discussed above, is premised on access to abortion; it is ill-suited to assessing claims that center instead on the unjustified dissimilarity of the law's treatment of the plaintiffs.⁸⁵

Thus, for example, a law that deliberately singles out certain religious adherents for differential treatment may be unconstitutional even if the restriction only negligibly or indirectly affects their ability to exercise their religion freely. In *Niemotko v. State of Maryland*⁸⁶ and Fowler v. Rhode Island,⁸⁷ the Supreme Court held that policies were unconstitutionally discriminatory where they denied Jehovah's Witnesses, but not other religious groups, the right to use public parks for religious gatherings.⁸⁸ In each case, the Court's focus was on the disparate treatment accorded the Witnesses. The Court did not appear interested in the extent to which this burden impeded the Witnesses' ability to practice their religion freely. Rather, the Court found objectionable the differential treatment of Witnesses as compared with other religious groups. In Niemotko, for example, the Court suggested that the Witnesses were being discriminated against because of the particular religious views and practices to which they adhered:

The conclusion is inescapable that the use of the park was denied because of the City Council's dislike for or disagreement with the Witnesses or their views. The right to equal protection of the laws, in the exercise of those freedoms of speech and religion protected by the First and Fourteenth

85. Strict scrutiny, in contrast, is equally well adapted to assessing claims of discrimination as it is to assessing substantive rights violations, and indeed it has historically been used to assess both kinds of claims. See, e.g., Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 541 (1942) (applying strict scrutiny to a classification that burdened a certain class of individuals' exercise of the fundamental right to procreation).

Amendments, has a firmer foundation than the whims or personal opinions of a local governing body.⁸⁹

The availability of equal protection as a claim distinct from undue burden is particularly important for laws—like TRAP laws—that do not purport to promote any interest in the embryo or fetus:

The deferential Casey standard [was] developed to balance women’s liberty and privacy against the state interest in protecting fetal life—an interest that [is] not related to the licensing and facility requirements imposed on abortion clinics by [TRAP] laws. By using the deferential Casey standard to replace the strict or heightened scrutiny that the women’s equal protection claims would normally warrant, these courts effectively took the view that the equality rights of pregnant women are attenuated when their unequal treatment relates to abortion.⁹⁰

Abortion restrictions that purport to promote women’s safety are more likely to be pretextual than measures that openly aim to discourage abortion or to promote the state’s interest in embryonic or fetal life. TRAP laws that profess to make abortion safer are in fact an increasingly potent part of the arsenal anti-abortion-rights activists are employing in their fight to make abortion illegal.⁹¹ Even where such laws do not succeed in shutting down all clinics, they aim to make abortion disfavored in the law, thereby “chang[ing] hearts and minds” on the issue and ultimately, activists hope, paving the way for a complete ban.⁹²

It should not matter whether these laws immediately achieve their long-term goal of blocking abortion access. The fact that they uniquely burden abortion without proper justification should make the laws invalid.⁹³ A recent Seventh Circuit decision upholding a preliminary injunction of Wisconsin's admitting privileges law acknowledged the distinct lens that an equal protection inquiry brings to cases of this kind, noting: "An issue of equal protection of the laws is lurking in this case. For the state seems indifferent to complications from non-hospital procedures other than surgical abortion (especially other gynecological procedures, even when they are more likely to produce complications)."⁹⁴

Because abortion remains a fundamental right after Casey,⁹⁵ courts should apply strict scrutiny to fundamental rights equal protection claims brought against abortion restrictions.⁹⁶ In Greenville Women's Clinic v. Bryant,⁹⁷ the court wrongly assumed the abortion right's fundamental status was in doubt after Casey.⁹⁸ As the Ninth Circuit pointed out in Tucson Women's

93. If courts were not so single-mindedly focused on the effects part of the undue burden test and instead took the "purpose prong" more seriously as an independent basis on which to invalidate an abortion law, the same conclusion could be reached under the undue burden standard. Clinic v. Eden,⁹⁹ this conclusion is contradicted by Casey itself.¹⁰⁰ Yet, despite recognizing this, the Ninth Circuit, like the Fourth Circuit, applied undue burden preemption rather than evaluating the equal protection claim independently under strict scrutiny.

At the very least, given that abortion is not only a fundamental but a controversial right, courts refusing to apply strict scrutiny to such claims should apply “second-order rational basis review” to fundamental rights equal protection claims in order to ensure that laws are not enacted out of animus to abortion providers.¹⁰¹ Had the Eighth Circuit in Dempsey applied this review, for example, it would have inquired into whether the state’s discrimination against abortion providers in the distribution of state family planning funds reflected such animus.¹⁰²

We need not speculate as to the outcome the Eighth Circuit would have reached to see that a traditional equal protection analysis is a very different one from the undue burden standard the court applied. The relevant questions should not be whether the law was intended to or in fact prevented or unduly burdened women’s access to abortion, but rather whether the state’s asserted interest in preserving embryonic and fetal life was sufficient to justify the disparate treatment of abortion providers, and—if so—how the denial of family planning funds related to that goal.¹⁰³ In fact, if the court was correct that the funding ban had a negligible impact on the availability of abortion because those abortions were paid for with private funds anyway,¹⁰⁴ this would seemingly undermine the state's justification for denying such funds. That denial would not save a single fetus, according to the court,¹⁰⁵ nor could the state plausibly claim that family planning funds were contributing to the destruction of fetuses.¹⁰⁶ Even if the court were to conclude that the law did not violate equal protection, it should have done so by focusing on the state's differential treatment of abortion and abortion providers, not on whether the restriction imposed an "undue burden" on women's access to abortion.

In addition to fundamental rights equal protection, sex discrimination provides another ground for challenging some abortion restrictions. Yet, here too, undue burden preemption has reared its head. In Tucson, plaintiffs separately claimed that the Arizona TRAP law constituted sex discrimination because it targeted for special burdens medical procedures sought only by women.¹⁰⁷ Although the Ninth Circuit did not rule out the possibility that the law discriminated based on sex, it invoked undue burden preemption, rendering plaintiff's claim irrelevant.¹⁰⁸

After the Supreme Court's decision in *Geduldig v. Aiello*¹⁰⁹ in 1974, it was generally believed that sex discrimination claims challenging classifications based on pregnancy (including laws targeting abortion) were no longer tenable.¹¹⁰ In Geduldig, the Court appeared to shut the door on such claims when it found that discrimination based on pregnancy was not (necessarily) sex discrimination under the Equal Protection Clause.¹¹¹ In 2003, however, in Nevada Dep't of Human Resources v. Hibbs,¹¹² the Supreme Court "implied that laws which facially discriminate on the basis of pregnancy, even those that facially appear to benefit pregnant persons, can still be unconstitutional if the medical or biological facts that distinguish pregnancy do not reasonably explain the discrimination at hand."¹¹³ The Ninth Circuit, seemingly breathing new life into sex discrimination claims in the abortion context, agreed that "Hibbs strongly supports plaintiffs' argument that singling out abortion in ways unrelated to the facts distinguishing abortion from other medical procedures is an unconstitutional form of discrimination on the basis of gender."¹¹⁴

But then, with the next breath, the court snuffed the flame. It concluded that, "even if laws singling out abortion can be judicially recognized as not gender neutral, where such laws facially promote maternal health or fetal life, Casey replaces the intermediate scrutiny such a law would normally receive under the equal protection clause with the undue burden standard"¹¹⁵ Inexplicably, the court suggested that Casey had specifically supplanted equal protection claims with the undue burden standard,¹¹⁶ although the joint opinion in Casey did not analyze the challenged provisions under Equal Protection Clause at all.¹¹⁷ If the Ninth Circuit had applied intermediate scrutiny to the sex discrimination equal protection claim at issue in Tucson, it would have asked whether the Arizona TRAP law was supported by an “exceedingly persuasive” justification, and whether the “‘discriminatory means employed’ [were] ‘substantially related to the achievement of important governmental objectives.’”¹¹⁸ Again, this analysis is a very different one from the undue burden standard that the court applied. The relevant questions should be not whether the law was intended to or in fact prevented or unduly burdened women’s access to abortion, but rather whether the state could justify the differential treatment of abortion providers by showing that the TRAP law was closely related to its stated goal of protecting women’s health. In addressing these questions, the burden of justification would have been on the State, not the plaintiffs.¹¹⁹ Instead, the Ninth Circuit’s flawed analysis rendered wholly superfluous the plaintiffs’ distinct claim premised on sex discrimination.¹²⁰

C. Compelled Speech

Compelled speech is the one claim besides the plaintiffs’ substantive due process claim that the Court specifically addressed in Casey.¹²¹ Casey by no means compels or even justifies undue burden preemption of free speech claims in the abortion context. But the joint opinion is sufficiently confusing in its treatment of physicians' First Amendment claims to have sowed confusion among lower courts as to whether or how the undue burden standard and compelled speech doctrine intersect. For example, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has held that compelled speech claims against pre-abortion ultrasound requirements and other mandated pre-abortion disclosures are essentially coextensive with undue burden claims against these laws.¹²² As with bodily integrity and equal protection claims, this results in a weakening of First Amendment compelled speech claims when they are raised in the context of abortion.

Generally, the Supreme Court closely reviews laws that target speech for regulation based on agreement or disagreement with the speaker's viewpoint.¹²³ The Court has explained:

As a general rule, laws that by their terms distinguish favored speech from disfavored speech on the basis of the ideas or views expressed are content based. . . . By contrast, laws that confer benefits or impose burdens on speech without reference to the ideas or views expressed are in most instances content neutral.¹²⁴

When laws discriminate on the basis of viewpoint, the Supreme Court generally applies "the most exacting scrutiny."¹²⁵ This rigorous scrutiny applies equally to laws that limit speech and those that “compel speakers to utter or distribute speech bearing a particular message.”¹²⁶

The Supreme Court has recently held that any “content-based” or “speaker-based” restriction on speech warrants heightened scrutiny.¹²⁷ Thus, even in the context of commercial speech, which has traditionally received less constitutional protection,¹²⁸ the Court has skeptically viewed restrictions it sees as discriminating based on the content of the speech or identity of the speaker.¹²⁹ Following these precedents, in R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. v. FDA,¹³⁰ the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit applied heightened scrutiny to strike down an FDA rule requiring new textual warnings and graphic images on cigarette packaging.¹³¹ The court found that the warnings “represent[ed] an ongoing effort to discourage consumers from buying the [tobacco] Companies’ products, rather than . . . a measure designed to combat specific deceptive claims.”¹³²

The Supreme Court’s precedents calling for stringent review of content-based speech restrictions have been applied to invalidate state interference with doctor–patient communications. For example, the Ninth Circuit invalidated a federal governmental policy that threatened to punish physicians for discussing with their patients the medical use of marijuana.¹³³

The court found that the law was content based, and therefore subject to heightened scrutiny, because it “condemn[ed] expression of a particular viewpoint, i.e., that medical marijuana would likely help a specific patient.”¹³⁴ Similarly, a federal district court recently enjoined a Florida law that forbade doctors to discuss gun ownership safety with their patients as part of the practice of preventive medicine.¹³⁵ Florida asserted that the law was intended to “prevent . . . harassment and discrimination by health care providers against patients based on their ownership of firearms.”¹³⁶ The court described the statute as “impos[ing] content-based restrictions on [physicians’] speech.”¹³⁷ The court found that “[t]he State, through this law, inserts itself in the doctor–patient relationship, prohibiting and burdening speech necessary to the proper practice of preventive medicine.”¹³⁸

Casey did not appear to apply heightened scrutiny to the “informed consent” provision at issue there, even though some of the required information clearly conveyed the state’s ideological opposition to abortion.¹³⁹ The statute in Casey “require[d] that, at least [twenty-four] hours before performing an abortion, a physician inform the woman of the nature of the procedure, the health risks of the abortion and of childbirth, and ‘the probable gestational age of the unborn child.’”¹⁴⁰ It also required that “[t]he physician or a qualified nonphysician must inform the woman of the availability of printed materials published by the State describing the fetus and providing information about medical assistance for childbirth, . . . child support from the father, and a list of agencies which provide adoption and other services as alternatives to abortion.”¹⁴¹ To the extent that some of the information was clearly viewpoint-based,¹⁴² Casey's failure to clearly apply heightened scrutiny seems inconsistent with existing case law.¹⁴³

States have wide latitude to regulate the medical profession in the interests of ensuring the public's safety.¹⁴⁴ This interest has prompted nearly every state to compel medical practitioners to convey information deemed necessary for a patient's informed consent.¹⁴⁵ The general purpose of informed consent laws is to

142. Telling women about the nature of the procedure and the risks of abortion and childbirth is the kind of information that is typically conveyed in normal informed consent dialogues. Infra note 146. But information that conveys what the embryo or fetus looks like, or that makes the alternative of childbirth seem more attractive or financially tenable, has nothing to do with the medical aspects of the woman's decision and is only provided because the state prefers that women choose childbirth. See id. at 935–36 (Blackmun, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“The requirements . . . that the woman be advised that medical assistance benefits may be available, and that the father is responsible for financial assistance in the support of the child similarly are poorly disguised elements of discouragement for the abortion decision.” (internal quotation marks omitted)). Pennsylvania does not require that women seeking prenatal care be told of the options of abortion or adoption. But see Texas Med. Providers v. Lakey, No. A-11-CA-486-SS, 2012 WL 373132, at *5 (W.D. Texas Feb. 6, 2012) (describing the plaintiffs' compelled speech claims in Casey as bordering on frivolous, unlike the First Amendment issue before the court).

143. Although the Supreme Court had not earlier evaluated similar “informed consent” laws under free speech doctrine, it did recognize that mandating specific information that is not normally part of medical informed consent was an impermissible attempt by the state to convey its viewpoint through the doctor. See Thornburgh v. Am. Coll. Obstetricians & Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 760–64 (1986) (invalidating disclosure requirements similar to those in Casey and describing them as “nothing less than an outright attempt to wedge the State's message discouraging abortion into the privacy of the informed-consent dialogue between the woman and her physician”), overruled by Casey, 505 U.S. 833. But see City of Akron v. Akron Ctr. for Reprod. Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416, 445 n.37 (1983), overruled by Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (noting in dicta that mandating “the availability of information on birth control and adoption . . . and the availability of assistance during pregnancy and after childbirth” if accurate, “certainly is not objectionable”).

inform, not to persuade or to convey a particular moral point of view.¹⁴⁶ “Informed consent” requirements like those validated in Casey, however, perform a very different function. Abortion disclosure laws have nothing to do with the practice of medicine or with ensuring patients’ safety¹⁴⁷ and everything to do with conveying the state’s disapproval of abortion.¹⁴⁸ For this reason, one would expect that they would be treated as other viewpoint discriminatory laws and subjected to at least heightened, if not strict, scrutiny.¹⁴⁹ Casey, however, did not clearly subject the disclosure mandate there to strict or heightened scrutiny. Casey’s treatment of the disclosure mandate is confusing and in part seemingly conflates due process analysis with First Amendment analysis. This has led some lower courts to conclude that First Amendment claims raised against abortion restrictions receive less protection.

In addressing the mandated disclosure law at issue in Casey, the Supreme Court first determined whether the requirement

147. This differentiates them, for example, from laws prohibiting the practice of sexual orientation change efforts (SOCE), as the latter are intended to protect patients from harm. See, e.g., King v. Christie, Civ. Action No. 13-5038, 2013 WL 5970343, at 15 (D.N.J. Va. State Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 642 (1943) (concluding that the state may not “prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion”).

violated the undue burden standard.¹⁵⁰ The Court's admonishment that any mandated information be "truthful and not misleading"¹⁵¹ seemed to refer to normal medical informed consent requirements,¹⁵² which mandate the provision of factual information to allow a patient autonomy in making her own decision about her care.¹⁵³ But the joint opinion also emphasized the state's prerogative to express its moral opposition to abortion and even to attempt to convince women not to choose abortion: the opinion stated, "Even in the earliest stages of pregnancy, the State may enact rules and regulations designed to encourage [a woman] to know that there are philosophic and social arguments of great weight that can be brought to bear in favor of continuing the pregnancy to full term."¹⁵⁴ The Court thus concluded that "informed choice need not be defined in such narrow terms that all considerations of the effect on the fetus are made irrelevant."¹⁵⁵

The Court next, very briefly, addressed whether the mandated disclosure violated physicians' First Amendment right not to speak.¹⁵⁶ The Court implicitly acknowledged that the First Amendment ordinarily protects against government-compelled speech, citing Wooley v. Maynard,¹⁵⁷ which held that New Hampshire could not constitutionally require citizens to display

Roe*,¹⁶⁰ a case in which physicians and patients challenged a law that required prescription information to be reported to the state.¹⁶¹

As commentators have observed, the juxtaposition of these two cases is odd and renders opaque the Court's meaning.¹⁶² Wooley is a First Amendment case establishing that laws requiring speakers to utter the state's ideological viewpoint are constitutionally impermissible.¹⁶³ Yet in discussing the physicians' First Amendment claim, the Casey joint opinion referred not to the permissibility of mandating that physicians provide information conveying the state's ideological opposition to abortion but only to the permissibility of requiring "information about the risks of abortion, and childbirth.”¹⁶⁴ The stronger First Amendment claim, that the state should not compel ideological speech or regulate speech based on its disagreement with the speaker’s viewpoint, was left unaddressed.¹⁶⁵

Whalen, on the other hand, is not about free speech at all. The Whalen plaintiffs had claimed that law violated the right to privacy, not the First Amendment.¹⁶⁶ The Court in Whalen disagreed that the statute violated the plaintiffs’ rights to privacy of personal information and independence in making important personal decisions.¹⁶⁷ Casey’s reliance on a privacy case to resolve physicians’ free speech claims sows confusion about the relationship, if any, between privacy claims and free speech claims against compelled disclosures in the abortion context. Nevertheless, as two federal district courts have observed, it seems unlikely that the authors of the Casey joint opinion intended to “analytically merge the First Amendment rights of doctors with the Fourteenth Amendment rights of women.”¹⁶⁸

Indeed, given the minimal attention plaintiffs devoted to the First

Invoking Casey, some lower courts have applied a deferential standard to uphold abortion laws that—more obviously than in Casey—insert the state into a doctor’s relationship with her patient for ideological reasons.¹⁶⁹ Some have done so by deliberately blurring the lines between the undue burden standard and First Amendment doctrine.¹⁷⁰

The Fifth Circuit has expressly interpreted Casey as tethering abortion providers’ free speech claims to the undue burden standard. In May 2011, Texas amended its abortion disclosure law to require that, before performing an abortion, physicians conduct and display a sonogram of the embryo or fetus, make audible the heartbeat for the woman to hear, and verbally explain to her the results of both procedures, including detailed descriptions of the fetus or embryo and a simultaneous verbal explanation of the heart auscultation.¹⁷¹ A woman may decline to view the images or hear the heartbeat, but in most circumstances she may not decline to receive an explanation of the sonogram images.¹⁷² No less than the anti-smoking messages in R.J. Reynolds, these requirements are an “unabashed attempt[] to evoke emotion (and perhaps embarrassment) and browbeat” abortion patients into choosing childbirth over abortion.¹⁷³

In Texas Medical Providers Performing Abortions v. Lakey,¹⁷⁴ abortion providers challenged these restrictions on a variety of grounds, including that they unconstitutionally compel physicians to engage in government-mandated speech and that they violate abortion patients' right not to speak by compelling them to certify the physician's compliance with the procedures.¹⁷⁵ The plaintiffs did not challenge the requirements on undue burden grounds.¹⁷⁶ The district court understood that the plaintiffs' choice to challenge the requirements on compelled speech grounds meant the court could not simply evaluate the requirements based on Casey's undue burden analysis of Pennsylvania's mandated disclosure requirement:

This Court quotes substantial portions of Casey[']s [undue burden analysis of Pennsylvania's mandated disclosure law] because Defendants rely heavily on [that] language in arguing Plaintiffs' First Amendment challenge lacks merit. However, . . . the Supreme Court's discussion is in the context of a constitutional challenge based upon a woman's Fourteenth Amendment Due Process right to an abortion, not a First Amendment challenge. Accordingly, while the Court's statements may be instructive on the First Amendment issue, they are not dispositive.¹⁷⁷

In addressing plaintiffs' compelled speech claim, the district court applied strict scrutiny.¹⁷⁸ Finding the physician–patient dialog to be either noncommercial speech or mixed commercial and noncommercial speech, the court noted that, “[o]utside the commercial context, ‘content-based regulations of speech are presumptively invalid.’”¹⁷⁹ The court then found that the new

Texas requirements violated the First Amendment rights of both abortion patients and their doctors.¹⁸⁰ The court concluded:

The net result of these provisions is: (1) a physician is required to say things and take expressive actions with which the physician may not ideologically agree, and which the physician may feel are medically unnecessary; (2) the pregnant woman must not only passively receive this potentially unwanted speech and expression, but must also actively participate—in the best case by simply signing an election form, and in the worst case by disclosing in writing extremely personal, medically irrelevant facts; and (3) the entire experience must be memorialized in records that are, at best, semi-private.¹⁸¹

Unlike the district court, the Fifth Circuit in Lakey saw Casey's undue burden analysis as inextricably linked to, and determinative of, compelled speech challenges to mandated disclosure laws in the abortion context.¹⁸² The Fifth Circuit panel relied not just on Casey but also on Gonzales v. Carhart,¹⁸³ which stated that “the government may use its voice and its regulatory authority to show its profound respect for the life within the woman.”¹⁸⁴ Gonzales did not involve any free speech challenge to the federal “partial-birth abortion” ban at issue there.¹⁸⁵ But this did not matter to the Fifth Circuit, which made clear that it viewed the answer to the undue burden question as dispositive of the compelled speech claim:

The import of these cases is clear. First, informed consent laws that do not impose an undue burden on the woman's right to have an abortion are permissible if they require truthful, nonmisleading, and relevant disclosures. Second, such laws are part of the state's reasonable regulation of medical practice and do not fall under the rubric of compelling “ideological” speech that triggers First Amendment strict scrutiny. Third, “relevant” informed consent may entail not only the physical and psychological risks to the expectant mother facing this “difficult moral decision,” but also the state’s legitimate interests in “protecting the potential life within her.”¹⁸⁶

The Fifth Circuit saw Casey’s undue burden standard not simply as relevant to the compelled speech question, but as displacing it. In the Fifth Circuit’s view, it is not possible for an abortion restriction to violate a constitutional right independent of a woman’s right to access abortion.¹⁸⁷ Like the Sixth Circuit considering a bodily integrity claim in DeWine, the Fifth Circuit in Lakey viewed the doctors’ First Amendment claims with suspicion, as if the plaintiffs were somehow impermissibly seeking an end-run around the undue burden standard.¹⁸⁸ The court labeled as an “omission” the plaintiffs’ failure to argue that the ultrasound requirements amounted to an undue burden, describing it as “significant.”¹⁸⁹ The Fifth Circuit observed: “[I]f [the restrictions] would not violate the woman’s privacy right under the Casey plurality opinion, then Appellees would, by means of their First Amendment claim, essentially trump the balance Casey struck between women’s rights and the states’ prerogatives.”¹⁹⁰ Thus, like the court in DeWine, the Fifth Circuit

186. Lakey, 667 F.3d at 576 (emphases added).

187. The one exception to this appears to be vagueness, which the Fifth Circuit appears to view as independent of the undue burden standard. See supra note 41 and accompanying text (discussing the Fifth Circuit’s treatment of the void for vagueness claim in Lakey).

189. Tex. Med. Providers Performing Abortion Servs. v. Lakey, 667 F.3d 570, 577 (5th Cir. 2012). The district court questioned how such an omission could be “significant” if the plaintiffs were not even making an undue burden claim. See Lakey, 2012 WL 373132, at *3 (noting that “Plaintiffs may have failed to make such allegations precisely because they were bringing First Amendment challenges on behalf of doctors” and “[Plaintiffs]—like this Court— court were surprised by the panel’s apparent importation of a Fourteenth Amendment ‘undue burden’ standard into their First Amendment compelled speech claims.”).

appears to view the undue burden standard as occupying the field of abortion regulation. Because these courts see the undue burden standard as striking a careful “balance” on the issue of abortion, they see any other claim that might invalidate an abortion restriction is seen as upsetting this balance.¹⁹¹ As discussed in Part II, this kind of “field preemption” is unprecedented in constitutional law.¹⁹² The federal district court in Lakey, on remand, accused the Fifth Circuit panel of “creat[ing] a special rule for informed consent for abortions” not supported by Casey.¹⁹³

The Eighth Circuit has come close to applying undue burden preemption to a compelled speech claim, albeit less obviously. In Planned Parenthood v. Rounds,¹⁹⁴ the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals, sitting en banc, refused to enjoin a requirement that abortion providers give a written statement to their patients asserting that abortion “will terminate the life of a whole, separate, unique, living human being.”¹⁹⁵ While the Eighth Circuit in Rounds did not as openly conflate the undue burden and First Amendment analyses as did the Fifth Circuit, its analysis still seems unlikely to be applied to any viewpoint-discriminatory speech regulation other than a post-Casey abortion law. The problem is that the Fifth and Eighth Circuits interpret “truthful, non-misleading information relevant to a patient’s decision” to encompass not just information typical to ordinary medical informed consent requirements—such as the comparative medical risks of abortion and childbirth—but also “information” clearly mandated purely for ideological reasons.¹⁹⁶

Indeed, in Rounds, the Eighth Circuit strained mightily to read the language at issue as non-ideological, interpreting it to mean simply that the embryo or fetus is biologically human, a fact that no woman of sound mind needs a doctor to tell her.¹⁹⁷ Similarly, the Fifth Circuit in Lakey described ultrasound images as “surely . . . the purest conceivable expression of ‘factual information,’”¹⁹⁸ although one wonders whether it would have seen the graphic anti-smoking photos in R.J. Reynolds in the same light.¹⁹⁹

Despite its confusing treatment of Pennsylvania’s mandated information law, Casey does not provide support for the idea that ideologically motivated disclosure requirements—such as those in Lakey and Rounds—do not violate the First Amendment. Casey did say that the state may express its preference for childbirth under the undue burden standard,²⁰⁰ but it omitted any mention of such ideologically motivated speech in its First Amendment discussion.²⁰¹ The district court in Lakey saw through the game being played by the Fifth and Eighth Circuits, saying of the Fifth Circuit panel decision:

is, within the abortion context, the doctor's right to speak, or not to speak, is wholly dependent on the contours of a woman's right to an abortion. . . . [T]his Court is concerned with the panel's implicit conflation of "reasonable regulation of medical practice," with "truthful, nonmisleading, and relevant disclosures"—particularly given the panel's broad definition of "relevant" in this context. As this Court reads the panel's opinion, an extended presentation, consisting of graphic images of aborted fetuses, and heartfelt testimonials about the horrors of abortion, would be "truthful, nonmisleading, and relevant." Accordingly, the government could apparently require doctors personally to make such presentations prior to performing abortions²⁰²

Courts should recognize that compelled speech claims address a very different interest than whether a woman's right to access abortion has been unduly burdened. There is no reason why ordinary First Amendment doctrine should not apply to these claims. Under that doctrine, viewpoint discriminatory, mandatory abortion disclosures should be assessed under strict scrutiny.

IV. A Critique of Undue Burden Preemption

The undue burden standard makes sense only as an inquiry that focuses on access to abortion. The Supreme Court in Casey specifically described Roe's "essential holding" as establishing "the right of the woman to choose to have an abortion before viability and to obtain it without undue interference from the State."²⁰³ The Court then went on to modify this standard to allow more restrictions on abortion access, so long as these were not unduly burdensome.²⁰⁴ The undue burden standard expressly looks at whether a law has the “purpose or effect of placing a substantial obstacle in the path of a woman seeking an abortion.”²⁰⁵ It therefore makes sense to apply the undue burden standard only to assertions that a law burdens, limits, or bars women’s access to abortion.

The application of a due process standard to a First Amendment issue improperly conflates two separate constitutional doctrines in a way that gives short shrift to the First Amendment.").

Abortion restrictions, however, often go beyond limiting access to abortion, implicating other distinct rights. The fact that an ultrasound law compels a physician to communicate certain information to a patient implicates the physician’s First Amendment rights irrespective of whether the law affects women’s ability to obtain abortions. That same law also implicates a woman’s bodily integrity, by forcing her to undergo a procedure ranging from somewhat to intensely intrusive, depending on the type of sonogram performed.²⁰⁶ Like the doctor’s compelled speech claim, the woman’s bodily intrusion claim exists independently of whether the requirement hampers or prevents her access to abortion. Even if abortion remains freely available and is no more expensive than before, her bodily integrity has been violated.

As discussed above, the Supreme Court’s prevailing approach to constitutional adjudication recognizes that a single claim may implicate more than one constitutional provision.²⁰⁷ In United States v. James Daniel Good Real Property, the Court recognized that the Fourth Amendment did not preempt the Fifth Amendment due process claim raised there because the claims were not interchangeable.²⁰⁸ The same principle holds true in the abortion context. Undue burden preemption allows the undue burden standard to gobble up, Pac-Man-like, wholly distinct constitutional claims that assert interests different from abortion access and sometimes even the interests of people other than abortion patients. There is nothing in Casey that justifies such an alarming expansion of the undue burden standard. Indeed, by separately analyzing the (tentatively argued) free speech claims raised in Casey,²⁰⁹ the Court clearly regarded these claims as distinct, confusing though its discussion may have been.

See Borgmann, The Constitutionality, supra note 33, at 67–72 (arguing that state-compelled pre-abortion sonography should be evaluated under strict scrutiny because, when conducted for the state’s ideological purposes, it is a significant physical and dignitary intrusion on a woman’s body).

The Graham doctrine—which allows certain constitutional claims to displace substantive due process claims—likewise does not support undue burden preemption.²¹⁰ In fact, undue burden preemption turns the Graham doctrine on its head. Under Graham, courts avoid applying substantive due process, the very source of the right to abortion protected by the undue burden standard.²¹¹ If Graham is justified—which itself is questionable²¹²—it is on the grounds that substantive due process is not grounded in explicit constitutional text and therefore lacks sufficient guideposts for courts.²¹³ The Court at least plausibly claims to prefer to analyze governmental action under an express constitutional provision, where that provision clearly applies.²¹⁴ In such cases, the Court purports to apply an analysis that it views as more or less interchangeable with (albeit more specific than) the substantive due process claim.²¹⁵

These justifications do not apply to undue burden preemption. First, Graham's impulse to avoid wading into the uncharted waters of substantive due process cannot possibly justify allowing a substantive due process claim to preempt any other constitutional claim. In an about-face from Graham, undue burden preemption has been applied to allow an unenumerated, substantive due process right—the right to abortion—to displace the textually explicit rights of equal protection and freedom of speech. As to bodily integrity, which is also unenumerated, there is still no reason one can draw from Graham for concluding that one substantive due process right preempts another. Second, in the cases in which courts have applied undue burden preemption, the preempted claims were not interchangeable with undue burden claims. As discussed above, each raised distinct concerns having nothing to do with whether a woman could access abortion.²¹⁶ Thus, under the sole exception to the prevailing approach, undue burden preemption is still indefensible.

V. Conclusion

Abortion has been wrongly subjected to special, disfavored treatment in many areas of the law. Most obviously, in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, the Supreme Court jettisoned strict scrutiny for a new constitutional test, custom made for abortion restrictions. This test opened the door for state legislatures' exceptional treatment of abortion, as they have piled on restrictions not applied to other medical procedures. Undue burden preemption, however, goes a step beyond this by interpreting the undue burden standard as preempting wholly unrelated constitutional claims. It thus effectively eliminates valid claims against abortion restrictions that are not about access—the issue for which the undue burden standard was clearly designed.

In other contexts, courts analyze separate constitutional rights claims individually, under the respective rules applicable to each claim. The only recognized exception to this rule—the Graham doctrine—further casts doubt on the legitimacy of undue burden exceptionalism. Under the Graham doctrine, courts displace substantive due process claims when a more specific constitutional provision also applies. In these cases, both claims are essentially duplicative, and the court eschews the doctrinal approach considered more amorphous and judicially precarious. Undue burden preemption turns this concept upside down. Courts abandon well-established tests—even under textually explicit provisions such as the First Amendment or the Equal Protection Clause—for the infamously nebulous undue burden standard. Undue burden preemption cannot be explained as anything other than a bald attempt to limit the constitutional avenues claimants may use to challenge abortion restrictions. It will be up to the Supreme Court to recognize and stop this trend.
